Concept Note

COVID-19 (SARS-Cov-2) was declared a global pandemic by The World Health Organization (WHO) on March 11, 2020. The virus became a pandemic with initial small chains of spread followed by increasingly wider transmission across most countries of the world. As a result, within a short period, the virus has affected almost every continent. Even with a risk of fatality of 1%, it is now known to kill healthy adults and children as well as elderly people with underlying health problems. The virus has created fear, anxiety and panic among people everywhere. Months of living in isolation and lockdown have negatively affected the mental health of large numbers of people. Most developing and underdeveloped countries are facing severe economic crisis, together with significant societal problems. For most countries, the virus has had the greatest impact on the economic and social sectors, taking into consideration population density, healthcare capacity, limited resources, existing poverty, environmental factors, social structure, and cultural norms. Major business sectors, like aviation, tourism, retail have been immensely affected due to COVID-19. Big Business houses have reduced their staffs and seeking alternative way-out for revival of dooming conditions. The pandemic has also changed the global social order. It is having an impact on every aspect of life around the globe, from individual relationships to institutional operations and international collaborations. This book concentrates on the changing patterns of work and global social order as a result of COVID-19. The impact of COVID-19 is also found in administrative management. The world order would change massively having some significant differences. From an individual's private life to the society they live in, the economic factors, patterns of work, job markets, and global social systems are all going through massive upheavals. The book will attempt to portray what work and the global social order might look like in the future. The book will benefit people from all sectors as it works with both economic and social perspectives—notably, individuals involved in the business and commercial sectors and social sciences. It will not only contribute to the research and academic learning of both teachers and students but also aims to educate many on the impacts of COVID-19, viewed from different perspectives.
